I regret that I can not give much credit to that worthy motive. No. By and large, it is because of the economical factor. This new method has been found to pay, and pay most handsomely; and that is the final answer. In fact, it is apparent from almost all that is written and said on the subject, that in civic and social welfare work, in the matter of disease and kindred hindrance to community interests, the questions involved are weighed more than ever with the thought of their economic quality. The demand for service is to be greater than ever before upon every dollar of capital, upon every effort of man; and it will fall nowhere more insistently than upon life insurance, which, if it would measure up to its high calling, must take the responsibility and...
