MADAME BRUNSBEBG MANCETJVEES. xt Come in, come ia, Monsieur llntendant, you have been long enough wiping your feet on that mat; come to the fire. I am glad you have returned to-day; the master and mistress are out, and we can have a nice chat. So spoke the good dame Brunsberg, spreading a snowy cloth upon an equally snowy table and preparing for two to dine. It was Sunday; the housekeeper was alone, and the sergeant, who had been away a fortnight on business for his master, had scarcely descended from his high dogcart when he was seized upon by his excellent and valued friend. For three years an intimate friendship had existed between these two, and if matters had not yet come to a point of explanation for the union of their destinies, it was certainly not the housekeepers fault, for, as far as modesty and dignity permitted, she had made all the advances, and had clearly shown him that, in his favour, she would consent to forget the late non-commissioned officer whose death she lamented. But Stacke, worthy, peaceable and silent on all occasions, was, on love subjects, more silent and more peaceable still; he failed utterly to comprehend her innuendoes, and was far from entertaining the idea that Madame Brunsbergs care and attention, the silver spoons taken from the cupboard and displayed before his admiring eyes, the daily calculation of the by no means small sums amassed by her saying...
