Bravery was a prerequisite both to entering and to pursuing the vocation. When a man suddenly lost his riding nerve, as he occasionally did from his own serious illness or from witnessing distressing accident to a loved companion, an accident such as plastered Bud Thompsons face with his brothers brains, he sometimes lost it forever, and with it his calling. Unless unhorsed by this infrequent cause, he rode until he received injury that promised permanence, or he sooner voluntarily retired. Physical injury, ordinarily the gift of bucking, and in the form of hernia, allowed to the average man but seven years of active riding. Once dropped from the centaurs, whether through injury or, much rarer, loss of riding nerve, he still lived on horseback, but regretfully, humiliatingly refrained from hair-pinning or forking at sight anything on four hoofs, and restricted himself to such animals as supposedly were not vicious. Courage was needed elsewhere than on the buckers back or amid the cattle. The cowboy by the nature of his work was required, from time to time, to endure the pitiless Northern. . .
